The decree, now before President Mohamed Morsi, will be put to a public referendum in two days time, after which it will be put into effect on Dec. 2. The decree, backed by legislative and constitutional amendments that were overwhelmingly approved in a referendum last month, states that the ruling generals will be in power for at least four years until elections are held, effectively ending parliamentary rule. Article 55 of the amendments gives the military, which led the revolt against longtime President Hosni Mubarak, the authority to rule the country in a "durable manner." Morsi's decree states that the military "will be the only political entity in the country." The military council's legitimacy will be limited to ensuring "the safety and protection of the homeland." Morsi, who was inaugurated on June 30 as Egypt's first democratically elected president, had said his decree was intended to guarantee the military's role as protector of the revolution. His campaign in recent weeks has been criticized by many Egyptians for not doing enough to 3da54e8ca3
