* To find Photoshop tutorials, check the tutorial category on the Adobe website. * Photoshop is available for free download from the Adobe website. Some time ago, someone asked me to show them how to work with the layers and masks in Photoshop and what they are. So I created a web page that explains the use of layers and masks in Photoshop. (At the time of writing, this web page was available at the following URL: `www.lynda.com/Photoshop-tutorials-education/Layers-and-Masks-in-Photoshop-CS5-%E2%80%93-part-1`.) ## Working with Layers To start working with layers, start with a blank file. Figure 2-1 shows a file with a single layer. FIGURE 2-1: A blank file with a single layer. Then create more layers to build on top of the previous layer. When you create a new layer, you are essentially using a mask as you work on the layers beneath it. In addition to the bit depth and color, the brightness, contrast, and other layers are stored in the same way. Each layer is treated as a separate bucket. In Photoshop, you can create layers to work on two different subjects in the same image. (The image in Figure 2-2 was created this way.) This split focus often helps you select which area you want to emphasize. Often, you use a specific layer with a different color or texture as the main image. Other times you use a layer for textures, reflections, or other special effects that can be used to enhance the main image. Figure 2-2 shows a lighter blue layer with the text on it. FIGURE 2-2: A file with two layers, one with text on it and one of the same color. You can create an unlimited number of layers. To do so, choose Layer?New Layer. The New Layer dialog box opens, as shown on the left in Figure 2-3. Simply name your layer and enter a description to help you the brain changes underlying substance abuse. While previous research has been directed to identifying drug effects on reward system circuitry, a growing body of evidence is starting to suggest that drug addiction is a widespread condition that can be best understood in terms of cognitive dysfunction. Specifically, there are recent data that suggest that the very experience of drug-seeking, as a need-driven state, is largely related to deficits in cognitive processes, such as executive and working memory. Using event-related functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI), we will use a unique double-blind design to test the following hypothesis: that the executive and working memory impairments involved in the drug-seeking process generalize to other naturally-occurring transitions (e.g., human social exchanges, not just drug seeking) in drug-addicted subjects. By measuring a full complement of neural activity (in both drug-free and drug-seeking states), we will examine how these impairments relate to changes in drug-state motivation, reward processes, and cognitive-behavioral factors. This proposal has three specific aims: 1) to establish that impaired working memory processes are related to drug-seeking in the naturalistic setting, 2) to establish that the effects of compromised working memory on drug seeking generalize to other naturally-occurring transitions in drug-addicted subjects (e.g., social interactions), and 3) to determine whether these impairments result from lower endogenous levels of dopamine in brain reward circuitry. In the aftermath of hurricanes and other disasters, the response of first-response workers, emergency management workers, and other personnel to vulnerable populations within a community can be crucial for saving lives, not only of those in need, but also for saving themselves from potentially traumatic exposure to the event. Identification of these workers with increased risks of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) is essential for more adequate response planning and interventions. This study examined predictors of PTSD in first responders and beneficiaries of Hurricane Katrina. The sample consisted of 236 first responders and 311 beneficiaries who participated in a long-term follow-up study of Hurricane Katrina, including 546 hurricane-exposed New Orleans adults. Assessments included PTSD symptoms, social support, hurricane-related stressors, disaster response, and sociodemographic variables. A logistic regression analysis showed that, after controlling for sociodemographic variables, previous exposure to life-threatening events (odds ratio [OR] = 1.92, 95% confidence interval [CI] = 1.09-3.40), awareness of personal injury during the storm (OR = 2.06, 95% CI = 1.13-3.75), number of people seeking help (OR = 2.05, 95% CI = 1.30-3.24), and recent exposures to violence (OR =

2.32, 95% CI = 1.28-4.21) predicted PTSD among Hurricane Katrina victims. The model explained 47.8% of PTSD variance. Implications for disaster preparedness and response planning are discussed.Ruodoushaolite Ruodoushaolite is a hydrous iron oxyhalide mineral with the formula $Fe_4O_3(OH)_3$.
