Since I played some of the classic NES and SNES games growing up, I've always been really interested in them. If I'm talking about a game, it's usually a discussion about the series and how it affected me. I tend to fall into role of the 80s child, raving about how awesome I am at certain games and also how they made me want to be an adult. The problem with nostalgia is that it can mess with one's eyes. Take for example Super Mario Bros. on the NES. While some of those games I played as a child, what stuck with me was more the backstory and the details. Mario on the NES is a very simplistic game. You run around jumping in between the ground, trees, buildings, and ground. Most of the enemies are the standard ones you'd find in a game of this type. As Mario, you can only jump on top of enemies, so finding a way to beat an enemy is as easy as jumping on them and beating them with the hammer. I like this game for all of the details that the NES had to offer. While there are so many backgrounds to run through, they're very small and very simple. I always imagine taking notes for class, but later that night, watching a movie with my parents. Even though it's a very basic game, I don't think it could ever be played by someone who hasn't played it before. I think what got to me more was the plot. In the game, you'
