Cervical cancer is a cancer strongly associated with human papillomavirus (HPV) infection. The expression of HPV type 16 E6 and E7 oncoproteins is thought to play an important role in malignant transformation of cervical epithelial cells. The binding of these proteins to the p53 tumour suppressor gene is known to cause its proteolytic inactivation by the viral E6 oncoprotein and its degradation by the E6-associated protein (E6AP). In addition, the E7 protein is known to be involved in the immortalisation of cervical cells and the transcriptional regulation of a number of cellular proteins. The high rate of seropositivity for HPV 16 in patients with cervical cancer indicates that this particular HPV type contributes significantly to the development of this malignancy. The association between HPV 16 infection and cervical cancer differs significantly between countries with different incidence rates. The presence of HPV 16 E6 and E7 oncoproteins is correlated with cervical intraepithelial neoplasia grades 1 to 3 and cervical carcinoma,

The basic difference between the two is that DLNA is for streaming media whereas XBMC is for playing media. The former requires a DLNA server such as Windows, Mac OS, Linux or a NAS device, the latter has no such requirement. In addition, DLNA media can be dragged and dropped onto XBMC, which is not possible for XBMC files. Linux users can also use XBMC for DLNA-related streaming. Two main types of discrete biotic and abiotic information are generally considered to be essential to the recognition of an object, such as a scene, a person, or a class of persons or things. They are modality and semantics, and they interact such that, in addition to the basic distinction between visual and aural, objects and events in the real world can be generally and optimally recognized only if they are recognized with the appropriate semantics.

Semantics are typically identified with social categories, denoting the class of an object or person. In several prior art implementations, a modality of information (e.g., visual or aural) is utilized in the recognition process. For example, a modality in the form of spectra is used in face recognition. In another example, a modality in the form of wavelengths is used in color recognition. In yet another example, a modality in the form of polarization information is used in polarization recognition. In one example, U.S. Pat. No. 6,493,834 (Callahan) describes a hand-held type spectral imaging apparatus with a diffraction grating and a prism for separating a beam of light into its components. The method includes receiving a first image from the diffraction grating and a second image from the prism and utilizing the first and second images to perform spectral information analysis of the image.

In another example, U.S. Pat. No. 5,321,501 (Kowarz, et al.) describes a method of measuring the spectral reflectance of an object which consists of measuring the spectral reflectance of a calibration object having known spectral reflectance characteristics, and storing this information, and then measuring the spectral reflectance of the object using a modified spectral imaging system. The spectral reflectance values from the calibration object and the object are then compared and the spectral properties of the object are calculated. In yet another example, U.S. Pat. No. 5,952,834 (Lee, et al.) describes an apparatus and method for recognizing a three-dimensional object using polarization and angle spectra. Polarization and angle spect
