To determine if increased neutrophil apoptosis contributes to the isoproterenol-induced immunopathology that occurs following beta-adrenergic receptor stimulation. Prospective, randomized, controlled laboratory study. Experimental laboratory at a university medical center. Male C3H/HeN mice. Isoproterenol infusion at a dose that increases circulating levels of catecholamines. Isoproterenol significantly prolonged the survival of neutrophils, macrophages, and neutrophil-specific phagocytic activity. Intracellular apoptotic activity of phagocytic cells was markedly reduced in the isoproterenol-treated mice. By contrast, apoptotic activity in the splenic B cells of these mice was not different from control mice. Isoproterenol also lowered circulating levels of circulating platelets, white blood cells, and hemoglobin. Isoproterenol-induced neutrophilia may be due to a decrease in the clearance of apoptotic neutrophils and a consequent accumulation of hypocellular neutrophils. By contrast, isoproterenol did not appear to modulate apoptosis in B cells. Therefore, prolonged survival of these cells may reduce their capacity to produce immunomodulatory proteins. We are very excited to announce the upcoming book Unbounded Community: Reclaiming the Intentional Community by Alex Willette & Josh Eagle. Unbounded Community is the second book in the Unbounded series. Like the previous book Unbounded Individualism, Unbounded Community seeks to promote intentional community as one of the most fulfilling modes of living. This alternative to the more usual American lifestyle seeks to promote community, self](#)
