Because of this, when an image's output needs to be altered, you need to use a RAW converter to output a RAW file instead. There are a variety of software options available for this purpose; some of the more popular options are shown in Figure 8-4 and Figure 8-5. This particular image was shot on a Nikon D3 and edited on a MAC using a combination of Adobe Lightroom (enabling the image to be opened at various resolutions) and Photoshop. * * * Figure 8-4 Various RAW converters available on the market. * * * Figure 8-5 Popular editing software that reads RAW files, such as Adobe Lightroom. If you have ever looked into midwifery education, you will have heard about the 4 theories that the US schools of nursing teach (Figure 1). These theories are: Tailored Learning Theory – the development of learning based on student needs and level of the curriculum; Theory of Care Model – which states that the nursing interventions may be planned and implemented to lead to the optimal results for the individual, clients, families, or populations, provided the care is within a specified level of competency; Theories of Human Development – the progression of stages that a human goes through; and the Mastery Model – which states that student learning includes achievement of competency and progress in the nursing role. These are all competency based education theories, which have been described by many authors as essential for student nurses to develop the required skills as they progress through the education programs. The content for Bachelor of Science in Nursing (BSN) is available from an accredited programme since 1999 (in the United States of America), however the theory is not. It is now only possible for students to have a one-course credit (or a contact hours) from which to study the theory. This is the present state of affairs in most countries around the world including Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and the UK. This post examines whether BSN educators can be taught theory at all. It is based on the fact that nurses are not interchangeable in the workplace. We know that, for example, a paediatric nurse, a critical care nurse, a trauma nurse, and an oncology nurse can all work well together on a ward. They have different skills and perspectives and they do not share the same theoretical basis for their work. The question is, can theory be taught or should it be taught? A question of perspective. A question of cost. Theory can be taught, but the question must be asked, can the theory that is taught be valid and true for the future workforce? The question must be asked because there has been a lot of research that has been done in the last 20 years around nurse competence and the effects that it has had in the modern practice of nursing. Theresford et al. completed research regarding this, and they found that theory had no place in nurse education. Based on their findings, they argue that theory would be an impractical and expensive means to acquire a nurse's competence. You can read their article here:
