to both the ability to detect CSF contamination in neurosurgical intraoperative samples and the ability to simultaneously characterize the patient's bioburden in relation to the surgical workspace. The use of whole genome sequencing could allow the detection of the pathogens that may be present, such as S. pneumoniae, which may have implications on the pharmacologic treatment of the patient and impact on an individual's medical decisions. Further comparisons of the performance of this platform with other platforms could be easily performed. The ability of this platform to scan the entire genome is a feature that cannot be easily accomplished by most other currently available platforms. The ability of this approach to detect pathogens at the species level is only possible with direct nucleic acid sequencing of the samples and is currently one of the most useful features of this platform. The ability to detect and characterize the pathogen load associated with the patient's bioburden and surgical site of interest would be of great importance to the surgical team in addressing the care of surgical patients. In an analysis of the cost of sequencing, we found that CSF remains the most costly of all specimens in this cohort. This trend was also reported by one of the commercial companies, but they chose to report the amount of sequencing needed for a diagnosis as opposed to the cost per specimen. Other costs such as reagent cost and use of the laboratory would remain the same. A reagent cost of $700 per patient is associated with the stool and as low as $400 for the tracheal aspirates. The cost of transport to and from the lab, lab fees, work station fees and salary for the personnel involved make up \~30% of the overall cost. From a cost per patient standpoint, this represents a reduction of \~2-fold. These costs could be reduced if the specimens are collected at the point of care. The other important aspect of the development and optimization of an epidemiologic approach, as was implemented in this study, is the development of the algorithms to enable the detection of the pathogens of interest within a specimen. The software was initially designed and tested on human blood samples to detect the common infectious agents and in blood products. Because of the ability of the analytic performance of the system to detect and characterize the pathogens of interest with high accuracy, the technology was then adapted to detect and characterize the bacteria of interest in the CSF. This technology could be applied in all specimens, but would be optimized for the most difficult to detect species. Additionally, this system is not limited to the

Q: How do I prevent my customers from discarding the packaging of my jars? I have a commercial jar that I am producing for retail customers. I am finding that my customers are opening the package, throwing the contents out and discarding the package. Is there a standard way to secure or keep a lid on that kind of behavior? A: That behavior is not standard. It is not nice, but it is legal. You can't really have any expectation of a customer. You will have to train your customer. As a first step, pay them and tell them that if they throw out the package you will require them to pay for its reinstallation in the store, or have it sent back to you. Let them know that after the first two packages, there will be a charge of $X for each additional package. If they throw out after the first few, you can get them on a discount schedule. You are then presenting them with a choice of moving up in the scale of prices or moving up in the scale of service. There are two distinct factors in a commercial can: safety and cost. The first is purely intrinsic, it is not achievable without some engineering trade-off. The second factor depends on market conditions, and you have to tread very carefully here. If the manufacturing cost per unit is $A, and the can is worth $B to its customer, then the first $A are worth whatever the market will pay for them, the second $A are worth the cost to the manufacturer, and if you can give a better experience to the customer than the market will pay for, then you can make a higher margin on the first $A than the second $A. The first factor can be your focus. If you can cover the cost with the sale price, and you can get higher margin on the sale, then you have a chance. A grocery store can't get much margin. "Super market" stores usually have more margin, since they can afford to have more efficient capital expenditure, they can sell at more gross margin. That's not always the case, but that's the general rule. The second factor is that can costs are often a large fraction of the finished product. Remember, even if your customer is willing to pay for everything, the cost of the can might easily come to more than the added retail cost of the food
