Clinical outcome of automated versus manual target-controlled anaesthesia. Our aim was to compare the efficacy of a new automated target-controlled infusion (TCI) system with that of a manual method. We conducted a prospective randomised study in patients undergoing laparoscopic gynecological surgery under general anaesthesia. Patients allocated to the automated target-controlled infusion system (group A) were managed with propofol TCI, whereas patients allocated to the manual infusion (group M) received propofol by continuous infusion.

Maintenance of anaesthesia was titrated to maintain a bispectral index (BIS) of 40-60. Propofol, remifentanil and cisatracurium were administered in a Dixon's up-and-down design. The primary outcome measure was the number of adjustments of the infusion rate required to achieve surgical conditions. Secondary outcome measures included recovery time, time to tracheal extubation, recovery indexes and side-effects. Thirty-eight patients underwent laparoscopic gynecological surgery in the study period. The number of adjustments of infusion rate required was lower in group A (2.3+/-2.4) than in group M (3.2+/-2.5) (P=0.016). Recovery time was shorter in group A (6.8+/-3.8) than in group M (8.1+/-3.7) (P=0.012).

Group A patients had a higher BIS at 10 and 20 min (P=0.016). Platelet function studies in Von Willebrand disease. In this review we describe the different methods used for studying platelet function in different groups of patients with Von Willebrand disease and platelet dysfunction. The focus is on biochemical studies, including Ristocetin-induced platelet aggregation, blood coagulation tests, quantitative analysis of platelet factor VIII, Ristocetin-induced platelet function receptor binding, and cross-linking studies of glycoprotein receptors in the presence or absence of von Willebrand factor. In addition, platelet degranulation, release studies and susceptibility of platelets to different pathological conditions is addressed
