Xpadder - OldVersion.com - Download.com - Biomechanical properties of endoleaks after endovascular treatment of aortic aneurysms: a study using finite element analysis. The purpose of this study was to investigate the biomechanical differences among type I and type II endoleaks after endovascular treatment of aortic aneurysms. Geometric models for a proximal aortic aneurysm with a type I endoleak and a type II endoleak were created. This model was composed of a rigid abdominal aorta, two endovascular grafts, five patient-specific endografts, the type I endoleak, and the type II endoleak. In the models of a type I endoleak, the stent-graft interface was fixed to simulate the leak. In the model of a type II endoleak, the inflow of the endoleak was fixed. Initially, the endograft was not placed in the abdominal aorta. We found that the pressure distribution in the grafted aorta in models with the type I endoleak was similar to that in models without an endoleak. By contrast, in models with a type II endoleak, a significant difference in pressure distribution was noted between that with and that without an endoleak. In addition, the stent-graft interface of the leak in the models with a type II endoleak did not show any significant difference in pressure distribution. However, the pressure distribution in the aneurysm neck and the stent-graft interface was significantly different between the models with and without endoleaks. An endoleak in a grafted aorta could be a cause of late post-operative endoleaks. In addition, we have suggested that complex endoleaks associated with stent-graft infections could be related to systemic infections. The present study suggests that finite element analysis may be useful to investigate the mechanisms of and determinants of the occurrence of endoleaks after endovascular treatment of abdominal aortic aneurysms.
